Professor fears for kin in Syria

► Local Islamic scholar worries in the wake of deadly protests in the country ► Embassy calls for Canadian citizens to leave Syria

The same day Canada's Foreign Affairs Department warned Canadians to leave Syria, a local professor with family in the unstable Middle East country said he fears things are only going to get worse.

"Of course I am concerned, not only for them but for the Syrian people as a whole," said Ibrahim Abu-Rabi, who is Palestinian but has three uncles and an aunt in Syria.

The warning comes amid reports by a human rights group of at least 120 people having been killed in two days, as forces of embattled president Bashar Assad fired at protesters.

The University of Alberta Islamic studies professor last travelled to Syria in the fall. He said he never would have predicted the level of violence now unfolding there.

He last spoke to his loved ones a week ago, including friends "in the religious hierarchy," and he agrees travel there is dangerous.

Three hundred people have died since anti-government protests began last month.

"I would not recommend anyone go to Syria, and I wouldn't go myself," said Abu-Rabi.

He called the political climate "stagnant for 50 years" and said he "hopes the Syrian regime will meet the demands of the different regions" for the nation's sake.

Shortfall gives rise to tax hike

The typical Edmonton homeowner could see a $119 hike in property taxes this year.

The city needs to collect $952 million for city services and another $354 million for provincial education.

That means the average homeowner will likely see a 4.8 per cent increase.

Prior to the education component, city council had approved a 3.85 per cent increase over 2010. They will discuss the new numbers Wednesday.

Meanwhile, apartment tax rates are decreasing 4.9 per cent and non-residential properties are increasing 11.1 per cent.

Notices will be mailed May 20. METRO

Last day for early bird voters

There's still a chance to get in an early vote for the May 2 federal election.

Advanced polls will be open for the last time today, from noon to 8 p.m.

Elections Canada said the first day for the advanced vote, Friday, was quite busy, with some experiencing wait times, and that Saturday was slightly slower. Polls were closed yesterday for Easter.

The nearest voting station is available on the backs of voter information cards, and can be found by calling 1-800-463-6868.

HEATHER MCINTYRE
@METRONEWS.CA

Making a difference is a priority for Monique Langridge, and thanks to Oprah she can do just that.

The St. Albert resident was an audience member when Stephen Paletta, to whom Oprah gave $1 million in 2008 to start his own foundation, returned earlier this month to talk about giveback.org.

Paletta then surprised the audience with $1,000 gift cards for charity.

"I was quite excited," said Langridge. "While I was sitting there, I put my mind to work about where I could put this to good use."

Langridge was in Chicago with her husband, Ian, an Edmonton fire captain, when she received a last-minute ticket from her hotel concierge.

"I was just over the moon," she said. "Getting on the show is like a lottery."

She plans to donate money to lymphoma research and treatment in the Chicago area, as the concierge lost her husband to the disease.

Portions of the money will also go to the MS Society, burn camps in both Canada and the U.S., supplies for colorectal cancer survivors (especially in the Third World) and the Edmonton-based Udder Project, which provides veterinary care in Rwanda.

Planning stage

- Langridge is working with Paletta to set up some of the processes in the U.S., and hopes that the little bit she can give now will only be the start.
- She attended the show April 6, and it aired April 8.
- This week she hopes to unveil the name of her foundation and finalize the beneficiaries.

Panning on a gold streak

It's been over a century since the last gold rush in Alberta petered out, but the record-high price for the precious metal has sparked a run on panning supplies and prospecting tools.

"Every day since Christmas, we've sold a gold pan. I've never seen anything like it," says Kathryn Walters of Bedrock Supply in Edmonton. "I definitely see gold fever this year."

And it isn't just pans that people are buying. Books on how to find gold are becoming almost as tricky to find as gold itself. New print runs have been ordered, and photocopied versions are filling the void until they're ready.

Neil Dougherty of Touchwood Enterprises in Edson, Alta., says sales of the top-of-the-line metal detectors he stocks have doubled in the last two years. They cost $5,595 and he sold 23 of them last year.

"I have more phone calls than I can answer in the next few days," Dougherty says about the rush of new customers.

Some customers plan on taking the detectors as far as Sudan, Dougherty says. But others, according to Walters, don't plan on even leaving Edmonton, intending, rather, to pan on the shores of the North Saskatchewan River.

In the 1890s, gold seekers worked the river's banks, and many industrial operators used massive steam-powered barges to dredge and sift the gravel in search of the powdery "flour gold" the river contained.

By 1907, the gold was gone and many of the original panners had moved north to the Klondike. But hope lives on.

James Blower, in his book Gold Rush, wrote that the river's gold was believed to have flowed from "a great many small pocket ets" rather than from a single source.

This past week, with the price of gold surpassing $1,500 per ounce, many Canadians are thinking now is the time to start hunting for gold again.

According to the Alberta government's mining ministry website, a $50 licence that's good for five years is required for anyone who wants to set up any equipment for washing sediments, such as a sluicibox or a rocker. There are other regulations, which include prohibiting the use of a backhoe or using mercury near the river's edge.

The richest deposits have probably been located and mined, the website warns.

"This means that amateur prospectors today are unlikely to strike it rich. But searching for gold and reliving a little of Alberta's history can still be fun," it states. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Yes, poetry.

Among highlights of the Edmonton Poetry Festival are tonight's adrenalin-frenzied Great Blinks of Fire, which gives 30 seconds to craft genius in the hot seat.

Posting early results could cost you $25K

► Elections Canada: Enforcement complaint-driven, officials won't monitor Twitter ► Rationale is to keep early results from influencing other voters

JOE LOFARO
@METRONEWS.CA

Posting election results on social-media sites before polls close on May 2 could land you a $25,000 fine, says Elections Canada.

Section 329 of the Canada Elections Act prohibits transmission of results before all polling stations have closed.

"It's important for us just to remind people that this is still on the books because there are possible ramifications to it," said Elections Canada spokesperson John Enright.

Still, Elections Canada's friendly reminder isn't sitting well with some Canadians.

Ottawa blogger Peter Raaymakers kickstarted a discussion on Twitter and since then Internet users worldwide have been weighing in on the ban.

On Thursday, he tweeted: "@mrbarnabyjones You really think people in the West are influenced by how people in the East are voting?"

Karren Brown from Alberta tweeted: "Think the University of Ottawa Law professor Michael Geist offered his expertise earlier this month in an affidavit for a court case challenging the constitutionality of the provision.

He wrote that such a ban in 2011 is "simply not possible without inflicting enormous harm to freedom of expression and public confidence in the election system."

LEADERS CROSS PATHS

Layton, Iggy share stage

The Liberal and NDP campaigns, which some polls suggest are in a tight race for second place in this election, came face to face yesterday.

Both Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff and NDP Leader Jack Layton gave remarks at a Sikh celebration in Toronto.

There have been plenty of instances during this campaign in which various leaders have crossed paths as they jet from city to city, but there hasn't yet been an event two leaders attended at the same time.

The annual Khalsa Day parade in Toronto is a huge affair that draws tens of thousands of Sikhs celebrating the birth of their religion.

The campaign clash comes as Ignatieff — as well as the other party leaders — have set their sights on Layton in recent days.

Slashed car tires, hateful graffiti, ripped campaign signs. Vandalism has spread throughout Toronto.

Liberal heavyweight Bob Rae and Eric Hoskins, a Liberal MPP, woke up on Saturday to see their car tires hacked.

While Rae's reaction was guarded, he acknowledged this is the "first campaign in which something like this has happened. Obviously signs get torn down and other things happen in a campaign.... I'm sorry this has happened, but life goes on," he said.

Rae tweeted Saturday his front left tire was slashed.

"It sounds like it's fairly widespread," he said of the vandalism, adding that when his wife took the car to get a new tire, somebody else was already at the shop whose car had been damaged by a key.

At least two-dozen cases of vandalism have been reported in the past couple of days.

Activists detained by Syrian forces

► More than 300 killed since uprising against Assad's regime began five weeks ago: Human rights group

Syrian security forces detained dozens of opposition activists and fired from rooftops in a seaside town yesterday as authorities turned to pinpoint raids after days of bloodshed brought international condemnation and defections from President Bashar Assad's regime.

The strategy, described by a rights activist, appeared to be aimed at rattling the opposition's leadership and showing that the state's ability to conduct arrest sweeps has not changed despite abolishing nearly 50-year-old emergency laws last week.

The rising violence — more than 120 people dead since Friday — brought calls from the watchdog group Human Rights Watch for a UN inquiry.

Yesterday's tactics also suggest a government effort to head off the round of protest marches.

The raids concentrated around the capital Damascus and Homs city, a hotbed of demonstrations against Assad's authoritarian rule. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Rebellious rap scene booms in Benghazi

A growing group of amateur rappers are inspiring rebel fighters heading into battle against Moammar Gadhafi's forces.

The music captures the anger and frustration young Libyans feel

One song is Youth of the Revolution, which rap group Music Masters wrote after the uprising began in mid-February.

The freewheeling rap scene is emblematic of changes seen in eastern Libya in recent months. Rap, like other forms of Western culture, was despised by Gadhafi, who burned foreign musical instruments and books after he seized power in 1969.

Insurance for tweets?

► New policies offer liability coverage for foot-in-mouth online posts

As more and more companies turn to Facebook, Twitter and other social-media sites to market products, communicate with customers and collect information, they leave themselves open to lawsuits over intellectual-property infringement and defamation.

And where there's risk, there's the insurance sector. Brokers in Canada are starting to develop coverage for the consequences of unruly posts.

The liability risk stems from the fact that many companies don't have clear, written policies for social networking, says Eric Dolden, a Vancouver insurance lawyer.

"My boss is a big fat cow" is a very common tweet," he says. "But people often stupidly then say where they work and who their boss is in the tweet."

The legal ramifications can be significant. "We've seen people, in their personal capacities — the 'big-fat-cow boss' — bringing a lawsuit against the individual," Dolden says. "And we've also seen the company take action because their brand is suddenly viral, negatively."

Dolden says demand for social-media coverage — which can cost up to $100,000 for a $10-million policy — is mostly from corporations. But it's only a matter of time before firms offer personal insurance lines, much like automobile insurance for drivers.

"I think it's going to come for individuals. It's probably about five years out," Dolden says. "And

"(Social-media insurance is) new in Canada. Brokers have caught on to what their colleagues are doing in the U.S. and have been very strong in promoting this class of business."

Radiation checks for Japanese cars

Japanese automakers are checking radiation levels on cars slated for export in a bid to ease worries among foreign buyers, the Japan Automobile Manufacturers Association says. The automakers are inspecting about 10 out of every 5,000 cars for radiation inside and on tires. Nothing has been detected so far, the group says. Japan has been struggling to contain radiation leaks since the March 11 tsunami damaged a nuclear power plant in the northeast. The radiation checks on auto exports will continue until the crisis subsides, the group says.

Mattel Inc. lost its claim to the billion-dollar Bratz doll line on Thursday when a U.S. federal jury awarded the copyright to rival MGA Entertainment Inc., along with more than $88 million US in damages for misappropriation of trade secrets. The verdict was a staggering blow to the toy giant, which has long claimed the smaller company stole the idea for the pouty-lipped toys that gave Mattel's Barbie a run for her money after decades of fashion-doll dominance.

younger you are, the more important this plan is to you and your future.

Some of the goals outlined in the plan should come as no surprise. As the plan states, "Citizens, stakeholders

The city's The Way We Green plan is available on its website. It outlines a vision for Edmonton in 2040.

The goals the plan outlines are nothing if not lofty. And, to be fair, all of them appear to be worth achieving. How able and willing we are to achieve them could prove to be another matter. Either way, it would be a good idea for you to look at this plan because it is likely to affect where and how you live in this city, as well as your tax bill. The goals the plan identifies 'sprawl' as the key challenge facing the city in the next 30 years."

I doubt that for anyone with even the most marginal of environmental consciousness and a modicum of common sense would argue against that being the case. However, in essence, we are putting our "green" future in the hands of the very same people who helped create many of the city's environmental concerns, which the plan is supposed to address.

You have to remember that it was the City of Edmonton that approved South Edmonton Common and the traffic bottleneck that has taken hundreds of millions of dollars to correct. I wonder if anyone ever determined what kind of impact the concrete, asphalt and emissions from the equipment that built the interchange and overpass has had on the environment?

The people who will be directing how this city becomes green are also the people who have approved every single new development on the edges of the city, much of which has resulted in prime agricultural land being paved over. It is also those new subdivisions that place real stress on the city's ability to create and maintain the infrastructure necessary to support those new subdivisions.

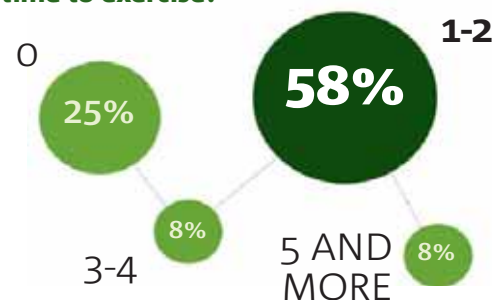

I'm all for creativity, so I think it's kind of a neat trick to create a problem and then position yourself as a key player in the solution to that problem.

This plan will be discussed May 11 at city hall at 1:30 p.m. One has to wonder why such an important document would be discussed at a time when very few Edmontonians are able to attend.

#elxn41: Be Heard

Metro invited Federation of Canadian Municipalities CEO Brock Carlton and columnist Ivor Tossell to discuss urban issues and what's missing from the federal election campaign. The following are excerpts from the online chat.

METRO: Why should a federal campaign address urban issues?

BROCK: The federal government has a large role to play in our cities and communities. Their policies and programs have a direct impact on cities and towns. The feds cannot deliver to Canadians without working with cities. Our country is too big and complex to work in silos. And we need national leadership from the feds on key issues that affect our economy, the environment and social issues.

IVOR: Well, you could ask, what does the federal government have to do with health care, which is also a provincial matter? The fact is that cities are a central part of Canadian life, just like health care. A national vision for what it means to live in a Canadian city is important — it's quality of life.

Mystery person hops to it to help woman and pet

An anonymous donor has purchased a $50,000 insurance policy to help an Oklahoma woman keep her pet kangaroo as a therapy pet.

The Broken Arrow city council is considering an exotic animal ordinance exemption that would allow Christie Carr to keep Irwin, the partially paralyzed red kangaroo, within city limits.

Council could vote May 3 on a proposal that would allow exotic animal owners to keep their pets if they obtain a newly created permit. The permit would require them to have a liability insurance policy for any injuries inflicted by the animal, certification showing the animal has adequate housing for its health, and meet all U.S. federal and state guidelines for licensing, among other provisions.

Carr said she couldn't have afforded to purchase such a policy and even contemplated moving out of Broken Arrow to continue caring for the animal. Coun. Richard Carter said the ordinance exemption is designed to allow Christie to keep Irwin within city limits while safeguarding residents from potential harm the animal might cause. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

► Friday Night Lights star gets so into character for role as South African war photographer in The Bang Bang Club, he needed counseling to get back out

NED EHRBAR
SCENE@METRONEWS.CA

Taking on the role of photojournalist Kevin Carter in The Bang Bang Club was hardly a vacation for Taylor Kitsch.

"I didn't sleep. It was a zoo to shoot," he says of the film, which tells the true story of a group of photographers covering the violent last days of apartheid in South Africa. "It wasn't a fun shoot for me at all. I had a lot of kidney problems playing Kev, through the diet and losing 30-something pounds."

Known to audiences for his work on Friday Night Lights, and starring alongside Hugh Jackman in Wolverine, Kitsch threw himself into playing Carter, starting before heading to Johannesburg for filming.

"I had two months to prep on my own in Austin, so that entailed shadowing a photographer, getting a Leica, which is about a 60-year-old film camera that Kev used, developing myself with that, shooting about five to 10 rolls a day and then losing the 30-something pounds just running every day in Austin," he explains.

"There's so much pressure I personally put on myself to do this guy justice, so I prepped and prepped so much. It brings your game up more. I would've done anything to get where I needed to be, to feel I could let the scene go. I was a wreck. It's an incredible amount of energy."

But any amount of effort was more than worth it, Kitsch insists, given how badly he wanted to do the film. "Even reading the script and fighting for the role, it was a matter of, like, I know I can play this guy truthfully," he says. "There's something that I know I could hit with him."

But while he worked relentlessly on getting into character, Kitsch wasn't necessarily prepared for how difficult it would be to get out of character, given the intense scenes Carter lived through. (Carter won a Pulitzer Prize for a photo of a young Sudanese girl resting being stalked by a vulture.)

"Some counseling was needed, and just separating yourself and being incredibly conscious of it and being OK that it's taking time to let go was a big thing for me."

"Playing other characters, I can let go and I can laugh a lot. It's not as heavy, obviously. But you take it home with you."

Luckily he won't be taking as much home with him again soon, as his next projects are more on the fun side. Of course, even his upcoming BattleShip — based on the board game — isn't without its gravitas.

"Just because it's this big film doesn't mean we can't have a very, very intense moment here or there, or have loss," he says.

Speaking of aliens, Kitsch will be keeping with the action genre as the title character in John Carter of Mars.

"I was looking at a 100-foot green screen and there was an X on it at the 75-foot mark, and that was supposed to be a ship that I'm blowing up," he says. "In situations like that, escapism is a lot harder as an actor, and tests you in different ways."

"With Bang Bang, I had a f---ing child and a vulture. If you can't put yourself in a present moment there, then you've got to go back to New York and study a bit more."

SAM D'AMATO
LIFE@METRONEWS.CA

METRO WORLD NEWS

WORRY ONE: Dances are basically foreplay for teen sex. I've discussed responsibility with my kid, but I am worried the advice will be forgotten after a night of dancing and too many episodes of Gossip Girl.

SAYS THE DOCTOR: The values and advice you have shared with your teenager hopefully have "sunk in" by the time prom rolls around. It is up to your child to be smart when it comes to sex. Worry about things you can orchestrate. Send your child off to have fun, but with a quiet reminder to be careful.

WORRY TWO: Someone else's kids are going to get drunk and drive. How do I warn my kid without sounding like a public service announcement? SAYS THE DOCTOR: You absolutely want to sound like a public service announcement! In the weeks leading up to the dance, remind your child of teen drunk driving tragedies. You can soften your parental stand by reminding your child that he or she is the most important thing in your life and it's your job to keep him or her safe. Sounds soppy, but it's true.

WORRY THREE: My child is an introvert and will probably spend the entire evening against the wall. What should I do?

SAYS THE DOCTOR: You might suggest that your child arrange to attend the dance with a group of friends or one friend. Beyond that, there's not a lot a parent can do ... and trying to hard makes the situation worse. If you try to discuss it, your child will tell you don't understand — and you probably don't. It hurts parents to see a child suffer, but as parents we have to accept the fact that we can't protect our children from every insult.

WORRY FOUR: There's an after-prom party at some other kid's house. The parents are out of town. There will be no chaperones. When do I storm in and act like a police officer?

SAYS THE DOCTOR: You don't. Why can't parents say NO anymore? The teen brain is not fully mature, particularly the part that thinks ahead, weighs consequences, and manages emotional impulses. Parties without chaperones tend to get out of hand easily: uninited guests appear, alcohol and drugs get consumed, noise levels rise and judgment fails. Neighbours call the police and your child winds up in a situation he or she never intended. Boundaries, parents, that's your job. Say no or offer to hold the party at your home.

► What to wear will not be the only decision your child will have to make.

Something old...

► Will Kate Middleton wear a family heirloom?

It's guaranteed that Kate Middleton will wear a tiara on her wedding day. What we don't know is if it will be old, new or borrowed from the royal vault.

Gifting a royal bride with a tiara as a wedding present is a long-standing royal tradition. For her wedding, the Queen presented Diana with The Cambridge Lovers Knot tiara, which was made in 1911 for Queen Mary. Sarah Ferguson was given a tiara the royals purchased from Garrard. Sophie, Countess of Wessex, was given a custom-made tiara. It featured jewels from a necklace belonging to Queen Victoria.

What do pancake mix, barbecue sauce, nachos & chicken have in common? They're used to create this dish

DINNER EXPRESS

EMILY RICHARDS
FOOD@METRONews.CA

I never back down from a challenge, so when Canadian Family magazine asked me to participate in the launch of its Food Awards, I was game.

The awards honour the top brands used in Canadian households, and will be announced in a special Winter Food Issue. In the meantime, readers can vote and participate in the Canadian Family Creative Cook Challenge (canadianfamily.ca/creative-cook-challenge), during which they must use provided ingredients to create dessert. My challenge involved pancake mix, plain yogurt, barbecue sauce and more. I came up with Crunchy Chicken Salad Waffle Wraps. I used the pancake mix and yogurt help to create a light fluffy waffle that stays soft and can be used to wrap the chicken, or simply serve it on top.

Preparation:

- Place pancake mix in bowl; set aside. In another bowl, whisk eggs, yogurt, milk and butter. Whisk into pancake mix until smooth.
- Heat waffle iron. For each waffle brush lightly with oil; pour in scant ½ cup (125 mL) of the batter. Close lid and cook for about 4 minutes or until steam stops and waffle is golden. Remove gently and repeat with remaining batter; set waffles aside.

3 Crunchy Chicken: In shallow baking dish, whisk barbecue sauce, mustard and thyme. Add chicken and turn to coat evenly; set aside for 10 minutes or cover and refrigerate 8 hours.

4 Combine nachos and mum mums in bag and crush into crumbs. Add parsley. Place few chicken strips in bag and shake to coat. Place coated chicken on parchment paper lined baking sheet and repeat with remaining chicken. Bake in 425 F (220 C) oven for 15 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Top waffles with lettuce and chicken.

Restaurants looking to contribute ecologically

Much has been made of the farm-to-table restaurant movement. But what happens to all the food that ends up uneaten at the table?

In what you might call a burgeoning table-to-farm movement, a small but growing number of companies are being launched around the U.S. to answer that question, to help restaurants deal with the ecologically expensive problem of food waste by composting it.

"The restaurant business is an incredibly wasteful business," says Peter Egelston, owner of Portsmouth Brewery restaurant in Portsmouth, N.H.

And so two years ago Egelston's brewery began composting with the help of EcoMovement, a company that hauls food waste from about 40 restaurants in the region and takes it to be composted.

But few restaurants have the space or time to compost their own waste. And so they typically pay to have it disposed of in landfills along with the rest of their trash.

But as communities have struggled to reduce their waste, pressure has mounted on the restaurant industry to do its part.

Making green

► Canadian companies emerging as leaders in the clean-tech industry

With each Earth Day that passes, our world becomes more ecologically aware. New, emerging technologies are greener, and vast profits are out there for innovators with the right product, in the right place, at the right time.

Canadian companies are beginning to do very well in the clean-tech field — but not without some considerable risk.

"You have to approach the market in a very strategic manner," says Gael Maurant, president and CEO of ARXX, a leading supplier of Insulating Concrete Forms (ICFs) for energy-efficient construction. "The construction industry is very averse to change. You have to make people comfortable with the idea they can do things differently, but at the same time, actually get a better product at a more cost-effective price."

ARXX is based in Cobourg, Ont. Maurant says proximity to the United States is a significant advantage for Canadian clean-tech firms.

"Americans are very receptive to working with Canadian companies, because they see Canadians as being honest and forthright, and as innovators," she notes.

"Primarily, Canadians are very adaptable. I think we're very open to new ideas. The idea of green buildings and energy savings is very rooted in Canada."

► Clean-tech is getting a "thumbs up" and providing new investment opportunities.

Scott MacDonald is a partner at Emerald Technology Ventures, an investment firm specializing in clean-tech start-ups.

He sees deteriorating global infrastructure as a huge opportunity for Canadian firms.

"There are 70 to 100-year-old assets — around the world — where they don't have technology and innovation right now," he says.

Clean tech

Be sure to check it out

► Fund The Alberta Clean Technology Fund announced a year ago its clean technology innovation fund had reached a thriving $187-million. The fund supports projects that boost renewable forms of energy, offering essential capital investment in the development of greener, cleaner energy sources.

"We're trying to make the grid smarter. We're trying to identify where leaks in water systems are. That's not an emerging market. That's a market that exists, that isn't presently efficient. We're taking real business problems that exist today, and finding clever solutions that are better for the environment."

But even though the market for cleaner products and practices can only grow, MacDonald warns the business risks are very real.

"Nothing in life is low-risk," he says. "We mitigate risk in certain ways, but clean-tech is high-risk. It's for big boys and girls. But the prize is so big in these markets, that Canada should absolutely — as a resource-based economy — be players in this space."

TURNING POINT

TERESA KRUIZE
LIFE@METRONEWS.CA

Unconventional and a risk taker. That describes Ottawa interior designer Jason Bellaire, who says that you have to get past your fear and believe in yourself if you're going to be successful in business.

After struggling with his career in his 20s, Bellaire decided to go back to school at the age of 30 to study interior design and architecture.

Jason raised a few eyebrows in the industry when he started his own company six months after graduation.

"It was hammered into our heads at school that you had to apprentice for five or six years before going out on your own. I had to overcome my fear and now looking back over the last two years I can't believe how far I've come."

Jason and his partner, Denise Hulaj, are the hot new design team taking our nation's capital by storm with 10 projects on the go.

He has this advice for people who are thinking about starting their own business.

"Plunge into the darkness, ignore the monsters and don't be afraid to ask for advice."

Jason's tips

Tools to a successful business design

- ▶ Believe in yourself and your talents.
- ▶ Don't make the same mistakes twice.

- ▶ Hang out with other successful people and learn.

- ▶ Find a mentor and ask lots of questions.

- ▶ Don't think that you know it all. Be humble.

Life after the lay-off

▶ Don't fall into failure-mode ▶ The future is bright!

A job loss effects more than just one person.

Lisa Caldas Kappesser, author of The Smart New Way to Get Hired, shares her advice on how to get everyone through it.

Communication

Discuss with your family what your job search strategy is and what steps you have taken or plan to take in the near future.

Communication is critical in families, particularly in times of stress and crisis when many people tend to withdraw.

Empathy

Everyone needs support and understanding. If you have children, listen to their concerns and keep in mind that most children are egocentric.

Optimism

Be a role model for your family in how to deal with crisis and change. Your children will be in a job search someday and will remember how you handled it.

They learn from your behavior, so it's best to model positive behavior.

Self-confidence

If you have confidence in yourself, your family and significant other will have more confidence that you can and will find another job. You need to think and act in terms of when you find your next job and not if you will find another job.

Conflict management

Accept that there will be disagreements and work to resolve them. It takes less energy to deal with a conflict when it first arises than it does after months of letting it build up.

Dealing with disagreements openly can help everyone move in a positive direction. Know that you might not agree at the end of your discussion.

Predators knock out the Ducks

Nick Spaling scored his second goal of the game at 4:53 of the third period and the Nashville Predators closed out their first post-season series victory to advance to the Western Conference semifinals, beating the Anaheim Ducks 4-2 yesterday.

Steve Sullivan scored a goal, David Legwand had an empty-netter and Jordin Tootoo assisted on Spaling's goals. The Predators won the series 4-2 in their sixth post-season in seven seasons.

Jason Blake scored a power-play goal, and Teemu Selanne also had a goal for the Ducks. Anaheim looked tired early after blowing a lead late before losing Game 5 in overtime. They looked tired late as coach Randy Carlyle went heavily with his top two lines, trying to rally.

Anaheim lost in the opening round for the third time in seven playoffs.

Canucks a loss away from epic collapse

► Schneider starts over Luongo, but falls to injury early in third period

Ben Smith scored on a rebound at 15:30 of overtime and the defending Stanley Cup champion Chicago Blackhawks beat the Vancouver Canucks 4-3 last night to force a seventh game in the opening-round series.

The Canucks, with the NHL's best record during the regular season, have lost three straight after it appeared they were in control of the series. Game 7 is tomorrow in Vancouver.

Smith, a rookie, followed in a long, hard shot from the point by teammate Niklas Hjalmarsson that bounced off goalie Roberto Luongo.

Luongo didn't start the game but was called upon in the third period, when Cory Schneider had to be helped off the ice after he was injured as he tried to stop Michael Frolik's penalty shot that tied it at 3.

Daniel Sedin, Alexandre Burrows and Kevin Bieska scored for the Canucks. Bryan Bickell and Dave Bolland added goals for the Blackhawks.

Chicago goalie Corey Crawford made 32 saves, including 12 in overtime when the Canucks pressed and appeared ready to win the game and end the series. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Flyers force a Game 7

Ville Leino scored 4:43 into overtime and Brian Boucher's return in a relief appearance sparked the Philadelphia Flyers to force Game 7 in their first-round playoff series against the Buffalo Sabres.

Danny Briere scored twice and Boucher stopped 24 shots in a 5-4 win yesterday in what's been a tight Boucher took over to start the second after Michael Leighton allowed three quick goals. Scott Hartnell and James van Riemsdyk also scored for the Flyers.
